which the Government claims to have effected material savings in their insurance premiums was received, during the course of which several illuminating facts were disclosed. In answer to a question as to why insurance agents and companies operating in the province had been given opportunity to quote on the new basis which the government had devised on the basis of the insurance rates, Mr. Manning stated that they were satisfied that "it would not be in the interest of the established insurance agents and companies to carry the insurance at the rates quoted, and that they could not do so in view of the services they rendered to the public. In competition with absentee capitalists who were not subject to the taxes, and other obligations of citizens resident in Alberta.

A JUST PRICE

"Mr. Manning admitted that the government was trying to establish a new basis of insurance rates, but he said that the principle did not apply to the government's insurance transactions. Mr. Manning further stated that the new insurance contract differed materially from what had been provided in effect for many years, and that the principle did not apply to the government's insurance transactions. He said that the new insurance contract differed materially from what had been provided in effect for many years, and that the principle did not apply to the government's insurance transactions.

OFFICIAL STATEMENT

The provincial government's recent announcement that a new deal in compulsory insurance rates had been arranged came as a surprise to insurance agents in the province, particularly in view of the fact that the government had previously stated that it was not interested in the insurance business.

DEAL IS DISTURBING

"This whole transaction, apart from its evident lack of ordinary business procedure, is highly disturbing to the insurance industry, which has been a valued and efficient agency in the province for many years."

SPECIFIC QUESTIONS

"A number of specific questions were asked which were replied to as follows:

"The government believes that the services companies with capital and credit are better able to provide insurance than the insurance companies which are now operating in the province."

The earth reflects sunlight exactly as the moon and the other planets. Since our earth is much larger than the moon and, unlike that body, is surrounded with clouds of high reflective power, earthlight on the moon is much greater than moonlight on earth.

HALF-ACRE in EDEN

BEGIN HERE TODAY

MARCIA CANFIELD, daughter of wealthy PHILIP CANFIELD, knows that the neighborhood is bustling with gossip over the sudden disappearance of FRANK KENDRICK.

On the second day following the robbery—the day when a disappointed Marcia Canfield was preparing to return from Chicago to her home—Tony awakened shortly after noon, again gave no notice to his father, and walked the few snow-covered miles to his brother's garage.

But Carlo was not there. Tony learned when he inquired of his brother's two employees, who were working happily on a disabled car.

Starting back toward the village Tony decided not to let another day pass without seeing him; he would look for Carlo at his home. He had never visited there—not had Dolly, his sister-in-law, ever visited him or his father—but he knew the house, a short walk from the garage and within a few minutes he had reached it.

The doorbell brought no response. Tony stood on the porch, considering. He had an imperative reason for wanting to talk with Carlo, a reason which must forever be kept from his father.

He had to know whether Carlo was involved by accident or design in the holdup of the restaurant.

The snow came back to him—two handfuls at the door, whispering a large pair of pliers produced from the pocket of one, and a hand which reached across the counter, within inches of Tony's face, to a telephone wires, pliers with taped handles, pliers with CS plainly scratched deep on one jaw.

He pressed the bell button again, no one answered. There was a window on the porch, and with a quick look, around, tested it. It was unlocked.

In a moment he was inside the house. An hour passed before he emerged.

It was an hour during which, even though he had come here expecting to find Carlo, he had been excited nervously for the return of Carlo. He had seen a shadow, he had searched anxiously and might have searched in vain had not an incident of Carlo's head been brought to mind.

In the basement was an old-fashioned, unopened and full of odds and ends. In the tray removed the burden and turned the tray over. Piled to the under side with strips of adhesive paper were several objects. Tony tore them off.

A few rings, a couple of watches, a small roll of bills. Just as he had Carlo, as a child, once concealed some money stolen from his mother's purse, and in the same old trunk!

For some reason which Tony could not define, tears came to his eyes at the memory. Tears which he impatiently, angrily, dashed away as he thrust the stuff in his pocket as he replaced the tray and its contents, closed the trunk and fled the house.

Home again, he managed to read a while to his father and to be content cheerfulness. But as soon as possible he went to his room and examined the things that were burning his pocket. Somehow he must accomplish a return to the owner, whoever they might be.

One ring he knew, and its owner a ring he had recognized even as he had hurriedly retrieved the stuff from Carlo's trunk. A ruby ring in a hand of gold worn thin by many years.

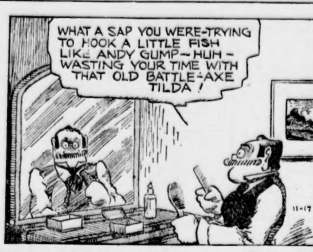

In her Chicago hotel room, Marcia Canfield attempted to close a door in her mind on further remembering thought of Frank Kendrick's latest flight. For flight it must have been, she knew. The shock of meeting John Waddell had been sufficient, her reason insisted, to send Frank forward on his uncertain and secret way.

A trifle grimly, Marcia inquired by telephone concerning the schedule of planes to New York. One was leaving within the hour. She did not bother to telegraph the servants at home.

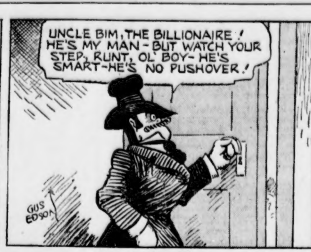

Packing her bag, she went down her hall and went to her room's window, where several persons waited to see her.

At the head of the line casually challenged the validity of items charged to her. Although the others in the line were impatient, the man ahead of Marcia was coolly putting the time to use; he had industriously sketching a startling

TONY STELLICI was not the sort of young man to suffer from the job market. He had, following the holdup of the Wagon, an entire day passed without his even forming a plan for tackling the task that faced him.

Tony's working hours were from 10 at night to 8 in the morning, he then slept until 1 or 2, and divided the afternoon and evening between his invalid father and his own simple pleasures.

But he passed the day alone in vain. He made only one telephone call, and that was fruitless; he telephoned the service station where the garage which Carlo, his brother, conducted on the road between Bobbie Neck and Stony Point. But Carlo was not in.

Carlo was the one entirely unsatisfactory element in Tony's life. Having abandoned the ways of industry and filial devotion which characterized his younger brother's existence, Carlo had long since left home and married, and some- times earned a living as a garage man, his latest and most ambitious venture being the garage, where

My guess is you're satisfied. I'm a hospital sort of fellow, isn't I?

Debunker

By John Harvey Furber, Ph. D.

THE idea of having a group of the most scholarly men of the kingdom to surround the ruler and advise him on matters of importance seems to be very old. Peter the Great, who was of Russia, employed a group of like men, whose sole work was to hatch out ideas for him. They specialized in making up new ways to tax the people. One device they contrived was to pass a law requiring all men to shave off their beards with a razor. But other idea they cooked up was to require all soldiers to get near examinations in arithmetic and geometry before they could get their regular incomes. This gave more work to the teachers.
